

The solar industry has "applauded" a statement by the Department of Energy and Climate Change that it was reviewing the date of the cut to the solar Feed-in Tariff. The Solar Trade Association is said to have been 'delighted' by the decision, reported by a number of environment news sources. Someone, variously a-spokesman-said or Climate Change Minister Greg Barker, depending on which report you're reading, is said to have explained the change of heart as a reaction to the industry's representations.

It's only a commitment to 'review', mind, with no firm promises, but it does show that there are elements within this coalition that are prepared to listen at least to what is being said by the people in the industry who are at the sharp end of the market.

Paul Barwell, the STA's chief executive, said in a statement: "It is very encouraging for the future that Government is listening to industry concerns, but we need certainty as soon as possible on the details of when and what the next tariff adjustments will be."

Possibly most surprising is that one of those advising a more environmental approach by the Government was Foreign Secretary William Hague, according to a report in The Guardian. In its environment news pages the paper published a letter said to be from Billy the Kid to the Cabinet, in which he urged the Government to do more to help green industries promote growth. He also warned that without a strong lead on the green economy there was no prospect of international climate change agreement.

That is all very encouraging; but as one tweeter put it, why did he put it in a confidential letter that was then leaked? Why not just say it?

One use of energy that did not meet with universal approval was by the aforementioned Greg Barker, according to a report in The Telegraph. Mr Barker has a dachshund puppy which accompanies him to work sometimes. This dog has a cushion which Mr Barker has on at least one occasion warmed up in the office microwave at the DECC, according to the report. Those who use the microwave to heat their lunches were less than impressed.

The dog, Otto (honest!), is also said to accompany Mr Barker to meetings. According to one source, quoted in the report, the dog was "the most popular member of the DECC ministerial team by a long way". There is no indication as to whether Otto talked the most sense.
